Exercise 6.

Listen to the text about the tea drinking tradition in Russia. Do Russian and English tea drinking traditions have anything in common?

Tea is popular in many countries and each country has its own traditions in drinking tea. The history of tea-drinking ceremony began in 1638 when the Russian Tsar Mikhail Fyodorovich was given tea as a special diplomatic gift from Altyn-Khan, the ruler of Mongolia. Till that time the Russians did not know anything about tea and made drinks from honey.

In Russia people have tea after meals, during mid-afternoon breaks. It is similar to the English “five-o’clock-tea” with the difference that the Russians drink tea at any time of the day and in any place — in the office, in the car, in the park. When you visit someone’s house, you are invited to have a cup of tea. It is not just tea but also lots of sandwiches, cakes and sweets. In Russia people often drink tea after supper.

Bagged tea is popular around the world, but many Russian families like to make tea in the old way — tea in tea-pots gives a better taste. Russians don’t like tea with milk or cream. They think that it changes the taste of the tea. But they like tea with lemon.

In the past, water was boiled in a samovar. The samovar was the centre of the Russian tea ceremony. All sorts of jam, honey, white bread and butter were on the table during the ceremony.
